Buyer Perception

Your buyers don't tell you the truth. They have no reason to lie to me.

> Every revenue decision you make is built on what buyers were willing to say to a salesperson. That's not the same as what happened.

01 Your CRM records the polite version

Every closed-lost reason in your pipeline was supplied by someone with no incentive to be honest. "Budget" often means "I didn't trust you enough to spend it." "Timing" often means "I'd already decided." Your forecasting, your coaching, your strategy: all built on polite fictions, recorded as fact.

02 A clean excuse ends the conversation. Honesty starts one.

Honesty with a salesperson buys the buyer more calls, more objection handling, and a conversation they don't want. A plausible reason ends it politely. They're not dishonest people. There's simply no upside in telling the truth to someone whose job is to change their mind.

03 Call recordings and AI can't fix this

They capture what was said. Not what was withheld. A buyer who has decided to say "we're going in a different direction" says it clearly, on the record. The AI transcribes it perfectly. The loss reason is logged with confidence. And it's still wrong. The real reason never entered the conversation.

Analysis of 187,000 G2 reviews

Right now, your former prospects and churned customers are telling peers exactly what they think of you. Some are recommending you. Some are warning people away. You can't see which. And it's building or destroying pipeline you'll never attribute.

WHAT BUYER PERCEPTION DOES

I partner with revenue leaders at B2B tech companies where every deal matters. I sit anonymously with the buyers who said no and the customers who left, and find out what actually happened. No attribution, no social cost, no reason to filter. You get the real reasons behind your wins, losses, and churn: which deals were recoverable, who's recommending you, and who's warning people away. Then we fix what the findings say needs fixing.

The first conversation is a Lost Revenue Assessment: your own numbers, one hour, no charge.
